tribes. Some have called this period the "dark ages" of Israel's history, a time when "everyone did as he saw fit" (Judg. 21:25). The Israelites were fortunate to maintain control over the territory they had won earlier under Joshua's leadership.

The Military Supremacy of Their Enemies: A second reason for Israel's failure to conquer all of the land was the military supremacy of their enemies. The most powerful weapon of war in the time of the Judges (early Iron Age) was the iron chariot. Every major power of that time maintained a chariot corps. However, chariots required a high level of technology to build and maintain, as well as great skill to train the horses and to drive during battle. Smaller countries and loose confederations of tribes such as the Israelites could not afford the great expense of building or purchasing these weapons of war. Moreover, the production of iron was a closely-guarded secret, one the Israelites did not have access to until later in their history.

Chariots were constructed of lightweight materials—a wooden frame covered with leather. They were pulled by two horses and manned with a driver and an archer. Their quick mobility made them difficult to hit by opposing archers. A squadron of chariots could fire off a volley of arrows and then move quickly to another point in the battle line.

The exact meaning of the term "iron chariots" (Josh. 17:16; Judg. 1:19; 4:3, 13) is unknown, but it does not refer to the entire chariot. It probably referred to some critical part of the chariot strengthened with a piece of iron. Since iron technology had only recently been developed, the addition of this iron piece probably impressed the Israelites with the might and technology of their enemies and raised fears in their minds.

Chariots had one major drawback: They were ineffective in mountainous terrain, where they had to travel in single file. Such a single file procession made them easy targets of enemy soldiers. Their best field of battle was out on the open plain where they could spread out and maneuver quickly.

The Israelites in the time of Joshua and the Judges did not have chariots, but they really did not need them in the hill country. As long as they fought their battles in
